BLACK AUSTRALORP: The Black Australorp is the Australian equivalent of the Orpington. These are a docile bird despite the dominant black color, and have an appealing round body with an upright 5-point comb. They are an excellent dual-purpose bird.

BUFF ORPINGTON: It was the early 1800's before the Buff Orpington was brought here. They have broad, smooth fitting feathers on their massive bodies. They're excellent winter birds, good layers, and with beautiful pale meat, this is a top-class dual purpose bird.

LAVENDER ORPINGTON: The Orpington breeds were originally developed in England in the 1880s; however, the lavender version was bred in the 1990s. Known to be curious, docile, and intelligent; they are large yet compact. A good egg layer, can be broody and will sit on any egg.

AMERUCANA: This American version of the Ameraucana has tail feathers unlike their rumpless ancestors. Not as big as other breeds, it is a fine layer of quality large blue-green eggs. Their delightful beards and multi-colors have kept it a very popular heritage breed for many years.

QTY:*QTY:

CUCKOO MARANS: Cuckoo Marans are historically a dual-purpose bird, laying 150-200 extremely dark brown eggs per year, with standard weights 7-8lb cockerel, and 6lb hen. They are generally quiet and docile, but are quite active, taking well to free ranging in rough terrain, and are also tough and disease-resistant.

BLUE ANDALUSIAN: Andalusians are originally from Spain and are a white egg layer. They are smallish, active, closely feathered birds that rarely go broody; roosters will weigh around 7lbs and hens 5lb. They tolerate heat better than cold, but need shade to retreat to when it becomes too hot or humid.

BIELEFELDER: The Bielefelder, known as a "gentle giant," is a relatively newer breed of chicken, first appearing in the USA in 2011. This breed has a great cold tolerance. They are friendly, calm chickens, and can produce large brown eggs.

COPPER MARANS: In post-war France, the breed was nearly non-existent. It was introduced to North America in the 1990s and is a popular breed today. They are fantastic egg layers with the darkest color egg. These birds are non-aggressive and are great at foraging.
